Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Taught by Mail: A Play in Three Acts (Reading-room of the Commercial Club, with heavy furniture, hangings and carpet. On the left is a large brick fireplace and mantel; on the mantel is a big French clock, and above it is an antlered deerhead. Back of the fireplace, on the left, is a door leading to the billiard room. Opposite this door, on the right, is the door to the front hallway. Between these two doors, occupying nearly all the back wall, is a very wide window, draped with rich maroon silk tapestry, well looped back so as not to obstruct the view, which is adequately commanded by a battery of easy chairs. Against the right wall near the hall door is a writing table, strong as a carpenter s bench and nearly as large, but small in comparison with the long library table that occupies the middle of the room. This ponderous piece, which must have been built in its place or at least brought into the room in sections, is covered with newspapers and pictorials neatly arranged in rows and piles. It is surrounded by easy chairs, straight chairs, and serving tables at convenient intervals. The walls of the room are adorned with paintings in huge gilt frames which go well with the pervading air of solid comfort and solid mahogany.
